

Gino Tellini. Alle origini della modernità letteraria. Società Editrice Fiorentina, 2013, pp. 208.

In his preface, Gino Tellini states the aim of his book: to use the exhibition material from the 2008 Florentine exposition, Dal vate al saltimbanco. L'avventura della poesia a Firenze tra la belle époque e avanguardie storiche, to investigate the manifold and antithetical literary movements that developed in Florence between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. These movements are critical to the genesis of the future Italian “modernità letteraria” (xi). The book is comprised of eight chapters: Persone, Luoghi, “La casa è l'uomo,” Intersezioni, Fiorentini d'adozione, La città riflessa, Il signore biancovestito and Etica e poesia, followed by a table of acronyms, the illustration index, the name index. It also includes a DVD.

In the first chapter, the author points out the central role of Florence as the recipient of the three major conflicting literary movements at the beginning of the twentieth century: the avant-gardists from the 1880s that promoted a cultural renewal through their works and new founded journals paving the way to the future modern Italian literature; the professors from the Istituto di Studi Superiori—representative of the traditional academic school—that fostered literary research in a rationalistic style; and the celebrity Gabriele D'Annunzio along with a handful of contributors to the literary magazine, Il Marzocco. Through numerous photographic portraits as well as reproductions of theatre posters, first-edition books, and periodicals, Tellini offers an account of the diverse personalities that populated Florence at that time.

In the second chapter Tellini demonstrates the coexistence of “energie contrastanti” (26) within the walls of the same city. Indeed, Florence was unique in witnessing the confrontation among four poetic trends: D'Annunzio's aestheticism; the classical and humanistic poetry of the academic professors; the expressionism and autobiographism of the contributors to La Voce, and the scornful and ironic poetry of the “Lacerbiani.” The Florentine city space therefore hosted four different types of poets: Il Vate, il Professore, l'Uomo Comune and il Saltimbanco (26), respectively. Also, by providing a thorough description of D'Annunzio's villa, of the Istituto di Studi Superiori's location and of the apartment where Giuseppe Prezzolini founded and ran La Voce, Tellini shows how the different places are actually emblematic of their inhabitants' poetic styles.

In the following chapter, the author dwells on the identification between an inhabited place and the individual that lives there. Through a number of quotations, Tellini offers an example of three different interiors that identify D'Annunzio's luxurious lifestyle, the Professors' lack of aesthetic appreciation and Prezzolini's sober life code. This corroborates Tellini's thesis that only in the city of Florence opposing protagonists coexist. In fact, the new anti-sublime poetry was generated from these antithetical cultural perspectives, to develop, later, into twentieth century modern Italian literature.

In chapter four, Tellini emphasizes two major phenomena that took place in Florence between the two centuries. If, on the one hand, the late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century anti-positivistic culture established connections with academic research, as demonstrated by the contributions in Il Marzocco, on the other hand, a violent breakup came about between the literary academic tradition and the avant-gardists through the new magazines. Particularly, the conflict focused on the philological studies on Dante and the historical research method adopted by the Istituto di Studi Superiori. This rift's effects would then reverberate along the twentieth-century literary culture.

In the next chapter, Tellini draws attention to the multiple young Italian poets that were mainly attracted by La Voce and Lacerba's activities and, therefore, chose Florence as their second home. Among these was Umberto Saba who, after publishing his first book, Poesie, under his new and final pseudonym, wrote an article, Quello che resta da fare ai poeti (94), in which he defined a new poetics distancing himself from D'Annunzio's poetry.

In the sixth chapter, Tellini illustrates how the literary production of the time mirrors the Florentine urban space. Indeed, the discordant artistic trends were reflected in the layouts of the literary magazines as well as in literary productions (both poetry and prose). Through a wide range of examples, the author shows the many dissimilar manners in which Florence was represented by intellectuals: aesthetically, realistically, mysteriously, or humanistically. Furthermore, a new poetic language was created opposing D'Annunzio's: The major representative of anti-sublime poetry was the Saltimbanco created by Palazzeschi.

In the next to last chapter, Tellini puts emphasis on Saba, Prezzolini, and Palazzeschi's aversion to D'Annunzio's aesthetic poetry and his followers.

The author concludes his book highlighting the cultural, social and political conflicts between the avant-gardists and the academic tradition. Moreover, Tellini demonstrates that the poetic style of the young poets who also served in The Great War expressed their feelings of anguish and disenchantment opposing D'Annunzio's rhetoric of the celebration of war.

Tellini's book represents a precious contribution to the history of nineteenth century Italian literature, in that it illustrates the genesis of modern literary culture from a geographical and biographical perspective with an emphasis on the daily experience of each individual artist. As in other works, Tellini does not separate the artist's life from the human being behind the writer. In fact, as he states in his premise, the quotidian details can contribute to the interpretation of the authors' literary production (x).

Also, by providing a great many literary excerpts by a number of the poets covered, he offers critical information that supports his thesis and meets the scope of his book, which is to diffuse the knowledge of the exhibited materials. These, in turn, add value to the book since they are comprised of numerous manuscripts, portraits of the artists, images of the places where the intellectuals lived, worked, and trod. Tellini excels at giving an iconographic representation of the conflicting literary tendencies leading the reader across the Florentine urban spaces and into the most private corners of the artists' homes. Furthermore, his unique style, resulting from erudition, synthesis, concision, and a wide range of accurate and learned vocabulary, makes the book a supplemental tool for knowledgeable scholars as well as interesting material for curious readers.
